SURVIVING THE STORM

Rescuers were searching for more victims last night after tornadoes struck in Oklahoma injuring 800 people. Entire towns were destroyed as the storm raced across mid-west America. Today thousands of people are relying on emergency shelter, food and water after one of the worst storms in history. A couple of survivors told me that when they had emerged from their neighbours – they had discovered their house had simply vanished. ‘It looks as if an atom bomb has gone off,’ said Kirk Humphreys, mayor of Oklahoma City. Worst hit was the town of Moore, which is south of Oklahoma City. Moore resident Lee Ann Richardson, who survived by hiding in her storm cellar, said: ‘There was no point in trying to escape - the only way to protect myself was to get underground. When I came out, I looked at my house, but it just wasn’t there.’ One tornado was more than a mile wide. Weathermen described it as a ‘wall of death’, it was the biggest tornado they had ever seen.

A weekend trip to Moore turned into a nightmare for Chad Harris. Harris, who was inside a trailer when the tornado struck, said he was lucky to be alive. ‘I couldn’t believe what was happening,’ said Mr Harris. ‘The trailer rolled over several times. It was the most frightening experience of my life.’ Nurse Ruth Hensley sheltered under a motorway bridge in Moore and watched the tornadoes pass by. She then helped an injured mother who had just saved her 11-year-old son. ‘The little boy said he flew up into the air,’ she said, ‘but his mother managed to catch him and hold him down. Their house was completely destroyed.’ The storms are thought to have reached F5 level – the worst possible for tornadoes. At this level houses are lifted off their foundations, cars fly through the air, and trains are overturned.
